About this book

All images in this book were generated in summer 2022 by an AI system called DALL·E 2 (openai.com/dall-e-2) to which author Lauri was granted access through signing up to a waiting list three months prior.

Giving the AI a short text description, a prompt, it generates nine completely new original images with a speed and realism that was unheard of before the year of writing this. The service was offered by the company OpenAI and since July 20, 2022, users of the system were given full usage rights to the images created by their prompts. We are in no doubt that during the following months and years, this kind of technology will become ubiquitous and increasingly more impressive. Nevertheless, we felt that there was value in capturing a snapshot of our early impressions herein.

In this book, we have curated a selection of various prompts and images that we found interesting. Not all prompts and images Lauri tried during the summer were included. Prompts on the pages appear in the form they were applied, including typographical errors, and were also gathered to an index at the end. All images generated were originally of size 1024 x 1024 pixels and included a signature on the lower right corner. The signature indicates that an AI system was used to create that image.

Special thanks to

Valtteri Kostiainen, Anna-Sophie Taylor, Aleksi Martikainen, Perttu Rekola, Topias Kähärä, Juho Rekola, Eemeli Ehrnrooth and Pekka Lepistö for prompt ideas and discussions, researchers at OpenAI and elsewhere for their work on AI and, most importantly, for all the artists of the past.

Preface

I’ve worked with AI art generation tools since 2018. That’s when Google released its BigGAN image generator[1]. BigGAN’s possibility space is limited but with enough settings to make its output feel personal. I generated a bunch of images and edited them into a video.

So I jumped onboard pretty much when style transfer was becoming a thing. Turn this image into a painting by van Gogh and so on. In a way not much has changed — image generators learn how to reproduce images so all they know is style imitation.

The introduction of CLIP[2] opened a new path and with CLIP hooked into a generator promptism emerged[3]. Words offer a different way of exploring a generator’s way of working. Artists can wax poetic and feel some ownership over the images they receive.

After an image generator is trained, all the possible images it can create already exist. This plane of existence is called the latent space. A prompt handled by CLIP works as a vector that points to a certain position within the latent space and thus to a certain image. In way these images are found, they are not created. This is how DALL-E works too.

Artist and filmmaker David O’Reilly has called DALL-E a scam[4]. Partly I agree and its good to be critical, that’s what art is good at. DALL-E has been trained on data which is scraped from the internet and without any authorial consent. Stolen, as much as digital theft is a thing. More than this electronic burglary I’m concerned with how boring it makes DALL-E. Many cool and beautiful images are used in creation of its latent space, of course its output can be like that too.

DALL-E doesn’t allow prompts that imply violence or nudity. The user has to come up with workarounds and in my experience they don’t yield the kinds of results I’m after. This prohibition makes DALL-E less credible as a tool, just imagine the history of art without nudity or violence.

I’m not that impressed with DALL-E and I find little magic in the images it creates. Call it overexposure. What remains to be seen is how it (and similar future implementations) lends itself as a tool into an artist’s toolbox.
